When asked whether he ever considered changing the rules over social issues, Carlos Rodriguez said that he was told he could change his rules at any moment after getting the job and that he would be fine having to live under rules that are just for entertainment purposes. "You see, there is a lot of conflict within law. It is the courts that decide everything - the social media for example, etcâ€¦ It's one thing to be angry from an opinion point of view, but it shouldn't be like, 'I believe in social justice but maybe something has gone wrongâ€"'," he said. Rodriguez admitted that he has been involved in many "horror plots" and "serious threats and incidents" against activists as well as their journalists. He said his attempts to avoid legal action of anyone involved in public life were all futile, and called on people to respect his rights even and accept his apology for his "very important job". However, some media, including a German broadcaster, are clearly very happy for him to say this - suggesting that when they say to him, this is about money and not people's personal safety. After all, we do not want to pay money for your right to speak, to take out money on political and social issues, just for 'doing what you wanted'. So who were the German media idiots and idiots who bought this. But what do journalists need to do if they want to tell the truth â€" no matter where you are in Germany? Do they do not care about people who tell lies? If so, how will they have any right to tell the truth. And is that the point you want to make? (11:30 pm) informacion documental? The current documents are of more limited length and are not of quality. The technicalities in these are that each entry has an initial and initial date which is used by reference in the draft. Thus, each entry is presented to an audience which is unaware of the date. These documents are also frequently incomplete/undesirable at times. Therefore they should not be considered as a guide to general grammar skills or the content of the documents. Some elements of the text may sometimes be too verbose for grammar purposes or may not indicate a clear understanding of the issue. This has been the case for many of the documents in the project since their first launch. Even the basic syntax and syntax errors made possible by poor wording are not yet considered as acceptable or considered as a serious problem. The documents that are already in beta now need to have a valid reference so the final draft can be sent back to us as fast and easily as possible and as quickly as possible for the final approval and design.
